FOREWORD

I have long believed that the majority of Australians regard sporting prowess as superior to intellectual or artistic attainments.

The furore around the use of sandpaper on a cricket ball to generate reverse swing is a case in point. This happened eight years ago and a newly published opinion by one of the participants has re-ignited the matter with polar opposite opinions being bruited about by various of the players and coaching staff.

Clearly not all the expressed opinions can be correct but on the basis that "it's not a lie if you believe it", no-one is lying either. That this is such a big issue is extraordinary but perhaps the media concentrating on this takes our minds off the parlous state of the world.

There should be some perspective on this. Firstly, no-one died, though those involved might well have died of shame at being discovered to be seen using sandpaper on a ball at a major cricket match.

Secondly, bowlers have for a long time been using various methods of rubbing a ball to try to achieve reverse swing, perhaps not illegal but surely against the spirit of the game.

Thirdly, though cricket is big here and in a couple of other countries, it is niche game elsewhere in the world, so this is not of international importance.

Sports are competitive and there is huge pressure to win so there will always be someone who will do"whatever it takes" to do so.

A former Australian cricket coach has gone on record saying that "reverse swing is now out of the game."

Now isn't that strange?
